ABSTRACT

A method for the quantitative analysis of the concentration of impurities in helium by means of ion mobility spectrometry is described, which consists in using purified argon together with the helium which has to be analyzed for forming the sample, or pure argon as counterflow gas in the separation zone of the instrument, or finally helium-purified argon mixtures both for the sample gas and for the counterflow gas.